

The Attention Economy and the Mind

1. Using the Across and Down clues, write the correct words in the numbered grid below. You can find the Word Bank after the puzzle, but beware, there are some distractor words that are not used in the puzzle.

ACROSS

- The practice of paying deliberate, non-judgmental attention to the present moment – often recommended as a response to distraction, though critics argue it addresses the symptom rather than the structural cause.
- The state of being broken into disconnected pieces – applied to thinking, it describes how constant interruption leaves knowledge incomplete, unconnected, and harder to use.
- The tendency to form strong loyalty to your own group and distrust or hostility toward outsiders – a deep human instinct that online platforms tend to amplify rather than reduce.

DOWN

- The process of making something louder or more widely distributed – in the context of social media, the way platforms spread certain content further than others based on how much emotional reaction it generates.
- The ability to think about your own thinking – to notice how your mind works, recognize when you are distracted, and reflect on your own reasoning processes.
- McLuhan's term for the way electric and digital media push people back toward tribal, collective, emotional identities after print culture had moved them toward individual reasoning – visible today in the rise of group identity politics online.

7. Giving a task or responsibility to an external party instead of doing it yourself – applied to memory, it means relying on devices to store and retrieve information rather than holding it in your own mind.
9. The mental focus and awareness you give to something at any given moment – the resource that technology companies compete to capture and keep.
11. A short story that teaches a moral lesson – a form the EduStory commentary specifically rejected in favor of ambiguity, preferring to show complexity rather than deliver a tidy message.
15. A signal – visual, sound, or vibration – from an app or device designed to interrupt what you are doing and pull your attention toward something the platform wants you to see.
18. A chemical in the brain associated with motivation and anticipation – it fires when you expect a reward, making you want to keep checking for something good even when you know nothing is there.
19. A set of computational rules a platform uses to decide what content to show you, in what order, and how prominently – with the goal of keeping you engaged as long as possible.
20. The process of splitting into two opposing, increasingly extreme groups with very little common ground – something that research suggests is accelerated by how social media algorithms favor content that triggers strong emotions.
8. Carefully selected, arranged, and presented – borrowed from the art world, it now describes how people choose which parts of their lives to show online.
10. Having no end or limit – used to describe the endless scroll design of social media feeds, which removes any natural stopping point that might prompt a user to put the app down.
12. Done with intention and careful thought, as opposed to automatically or out of habit – a quality that the 'What Now?' framework argues should be at the center of your relationship with technology.
13. Input or experience that activates the mind and senses – something the digital world provides in such constant supply that the absence of it has become uncomfortable for many people.
14. The gradual weakening or loss of a skill, capacity, or ability through lack of use – something that can happen to memory, focus, or even empathy when they are not regularly exercised.
16. Material that slowly settles to the bottom of a body of still water – used in the story as a metaphor for the gradual accumulation of thought that only happens when the mind is given space and quiet.
17. The quality of being fully engaged with and aware of the current moment, the people around you, and the task at hand – the opposite of being physically somewhere while mentally elsewhere.
